Excerpt from The Wild Tribes of India The chief abode of the aboriginal races to be described is the centre of the peninsula - namely, the Vindhya mountains, which run east and west, from the Ganges to Guzerat, and the broad forest-tract extending north and south from the neighbourhood of Allahabad to the banks Of the Godavery; but they are not necessarily the aborigines of the places they now occupy. In the Vedas the Dasyas are spoken of as having given a great deal of trouble and annoy ance to the Brahmans; and they were apparently pushed into their present homes by successive tides of invaders operating against them, and often appear as if they were cut off into small parties in their flight, portions of the same race being found scattered in different corners of the country. The main divi sions of the Darya race as now seen are: the Gonds, the Bheels, the Kolis, the Mairs and Meenas, thc Khonds, the Koles, and the Sonthals; but they are not all one people - at least not at the present day.
